

To the Chair of Exam Consultation,

The route to becoming a registered psychologist is becoming more and more difficult and far reached. Do you want our profession to become marginalised and low in numbers? It seems that way.

I do not see a need for a National Psychology Examination. Why? Psychology knowledge and competencies is ALREADY been assessed in psychology coursework. And furthermore (as you know), psychology coursework is audited to ensure that there is a consistent professional standard of psychologists nationally.

Please, think of our profession. We don't have specialist titles anymore, which seems to blur our sets of skills; particularly in the workplace. Please, get rid of the exam.

Thank you.

Kind regards,

Daphne Simoens (B.Psych)

Psychologist with Provisional Registration